

Local Authority

It sits in the Gulf of Mexico like the period at the end of an exclamation point—fantastic, eccentric, exciting Key West. Between the museums, the military forts, the restaurants, the bars and the countless art galleries and shops waiting to be browsed, there's enough here to keep attendees busy for weeks, let alone days.

If you can tear people away from ogling treasures excavated from sunken Spanish galleons, or searching for trinkets at the local Bahamian marketplace, Key West also boasts its own version of the great outdoors, and a good DMC can make it even greater.

Specializing in corporate and incentive travel, the aptly named We've Got the Keys (www.wevegotthekeys.com) offers a full array of creative programs to help attendees get the most out of their stay in the Southernmost City, including Jet-ski tours and sunset cruises.

One of their most popular excursions, the Ultimate Adventure, starts with breakfast aboard a catamaran that ferries the group out to a living coral reef for a morning of snorkeling. Participants may dry off for lunch, but then it's back to the water with parasailing, Jet-skiing and stand-up paddle boarding. A water trampoline and rock climbing are also part of the fun.

"Attendees are free to try any or all of these activities," says Nadene Grossman, owner of We've Got the Keys. "We can accommodate up to 100, but I've also done this trip for 200 using two boats."

Another crowd pleaser, Grossman says, is the company's Southernmost Scavenger Hunt. Rather than giving teams a list of items to find, teams are required to decipher clues that take them to historic locations. Once there, they have to engage in some type of activity, such as posing as historical figures or taking photographs, which are later judged for creativity.

"It's very interactive," Grossman says. "Of course, everybody's competitive nature kicks in, so it's a lot of fun. And it's a great way to explore Key West because it takes attendees to places they may not have discovered on their own."

the Abyss" statue, a replica of a similar figure in the Mediterranean. Groups that prefer to stay dry can also take the park's Spirit of Pennekamp glass-bottom boat tour, offering spectacular views of this amazing underwater realm.

Key Largo is also just across Florida Bay from the Everglades, and local operators can outfit groups for kayaking the shallow flats in between, as guides point out local flora and fauna. Animal encounters are also waiting at the key's Dolphin Cove Research & Education Center, where groups of up to 36 can swim with dolphins and tour the marine education facility.

Leaving Key Largo, next up along the Overseas Highway are the islands of Islamorada—including Plantation, Windley and Upper and Lower Matecumbe Keys—known as the "Sport-Fishing Capital of the World" and boasting more professional charter boats than anywhere else in the state, if not the nation. If you're dealing with a group of landlubbers, you can still enjoy something "fishy" at Robbie's Marina, where 50 to 100 tarpon visit daily and linger for hours as visitors hand feed them.

But aquatic adventures aren't the only activity on the agenda here. A group of Islamorada galleries, restaurants and shops have formed the Morada Bay Arts & Cultural District, set just off the Overseas Highway and featuring Art Walks on the third Thursday of each month that include live music in a street festival setting.

"It seems like every month, we get more and more people. It's really becoming very popular here," says Carol DelCorio, a sales associate at Gallery Morada, one of the participating venues.

Meanwhile, Upper Keys properties offer some of the largest meeting space in the island chain. The Hilton Key Largo Resort, for one, has over 17,000 square feet of flexible meeting space, including two ballrooms; the Ocean Reef Club on Key Largo boasts 30,000 square feet of meeting space; and Islamorada's Cheeca Lodge & Spa offers a 4,600-square-foot conference center along with a new rooftop lounge for corporate events and private functions.

MIDDLE AND LOWER KEYS

From ocean depths to sky-blue heights, the Middle Keys, also known as the islands of Marathon, have a lock on fun and excitement.

"In a nutshell, the islands of Marathon offer so much to do, whether a group wants to work on team building or a planner needs activities for spouse and kids programs," says Daniel Samess, CEO of the Greater Marathon Chamber of Commerce and Visitor Center.

Team building and education combine at the Dolphin Research Center on Grassy Key, where a variety of interaction programs include Researcher for a Day, which allows attendees to become part of a research team, exploring the intelligence of dolphins and sea lions and getting real, hands-on responsibilities as well as personalized instruction.

Heading upward from there, Marathon's Island Hoppers helicopter tours has expanded its menu of aerial adventures with a new Scenic Shoreline Flight, which soars over the Middle Keys and Islamorada before skimming the backcountry of the Everglades and Ten Thousand Islands. Departing from Marathon Airport, the 4.5-hour tour includes lunch at the Cabbage Key Inn on the mainland near Fort Myers. The maximum number of passengers is three.

"It's a great tour," says Dave Odom, Island Hoppers' owner and pilot. "We also offer 15-minute scenic flights if you want to get more people in on the fun."

"Fun" is also the key word at places like Crane Point, a 63.5-acre archaeological site featuring a wild bird rehabilitation center, a butterfly garden and nature trails that wind through a natural Florida Keys hardwood hammock.

At meeting time, the islands of Marathon are home to a number of properties catering to groups, including Hawks Cay, with over 20,000 square feet of meeting space and a private event catamaran; and Tranquility Bay Beach House Resort, with indoor meeting space for up to 30 and a 3,000-square-foot private beach.

New on the scene in the Middle Keys is the Holiday Inn Express & Suites, with 134 rooms and a 24-hour business center; and a new conference and event facility at the Coral Lagoon Resort that accommodates up to 75.

In the "what a way to go" category is leaving the Middle Keys over the Seven Mile Bridge, which is the longest segmental bridge in the world and rises over the Gulf of Mexico on one side and the Atlantic on the other. At the bridge's end are the Lower Keys and a host of natural adventures, from kayaking the open water and islands of the Great White Heron National Wildlife Refuge, home and breeding ground of one of North America's largest wading birds, to following
